THE NEW ISABELLA

By MARGARET LEE.

(Copyright, 1904, by American Press Association.)

"No, no, no," said Miss Barclay to her brother, "I am not going to let you go to the States. You are entirely business cases. I suppose I was wrong."

"The last sentence was spoken dramatically."

"How do you mean?"

"It would be difficult to explain the meaning of my remark. We often see our mistake too late to say anything but regret them. Now, if you will go to the States."

Miss Barclay left the room, and Mr. Howe looked around him as if taking a mental inventory of its contents. It was certainly an expensively furnished apartment, but people are given to overlooking a lot of costly trinkets and concentrating their attention on a few objects of value, even if other parts of the house are left bare of ordinary necessities. Then, again, Mr. Barclay might possess some resources, although the incident of the diamonds was against this supposition.

Mr. Howe was anxious to be charitable, but any practical person would wonder how a man could expect to support a family in such surroundings upon a salary of $5,000 a year and make provision for their comfortable maintenance. Barclay also owned a country house, and he belonged to several clubs, of which he was a prominent member. The inconsistency of his method of living was apparent to all who knew him. He was a man of great energy and ambition, but he was also a man of great vanity. He was a man of great energy and ambition, but he was also a man of great vanity.

"You say there is money in the house?"

"Yes. We had to dispose of the diamonds. Several persons refused to give us any more credit."

"Have you any plans whatever?"

"No, Miss Barclay is protesting. I am too anxious about her to think of anything else. She dictated the letter. If we could only get away from here with the children."

"Have you any resources personally?"

"I mean this thing, but you need never mind."

"Why not, when you are so kind?"

"I have nothing. Jasper has taken care of me."

"Does he own this house?"

"Yes, but Uncle Charles says that the bank will take everything. However, that is only right. I suppose we are better off."

"She looked straight at Mr. Howe. A slight frown made him more attentive."

"I wouldn't put it quite so hard. You must have relatives able to assist you until you can adopt some method for taking care of these children."

"Relatives? Yes. Not one has offered to do a single thing for us. I think they are all too busy to care for us. I can explain my own folly, my blindness. But I never dreamed of such a possibility. I did not know the amount of Jasper's salary, and was always alluding to successful speculations."

"Miss Barclay, you must cease thinking of this folly. No one accuses him of promiscuous crime. He yielded to temptation. We must be practical. If we have to do anything of real benefit to our children, we must do it."

"The children might go. I am afraid Mrs. Barclay is too weak to travel, and I am anxious to see Mr. Messenger again. He must have meant to do something."

"Have you a trustworthy servant?"

"Yes, the nurse. She is devoted to us."

"Let her take the children to the country house as soon as possible. When that time comes, we shall see clearly what the next move should be. Can you attend to this yourself? Are you equal, I mean physically, to taking hold and managing matters for your brother?"

"I must be able. There is nobody else to do it."

Mr. Howe regarded her slight figure and white, eager face.

"We can't take a third person into our confidence. You must not mention me to Messenger. So what money the bank will give. Now, here is money."

"Oh, indeed? It is not?"

"Let me know how. You and Mrs. Barclay cannot dispose of your trinkets for a long time. That only complicates things more. This is a loan. I can settle with Barclay hereafter. Now you will get the children away and keep a good heart until I see you again."

Mr. Howe pressed her hand, gave her a bright look and hurried out of the room.

Miss Barclay sat down quite overpowered by the increasing strain of her recognition. She gazed about the room, recognizing the familiar objects. She was not suffering in a violent way, but she was struggling with realities. Who could Mr. Howe be? A business acquaintance? Well, perhaps not. He seemed to be a man of another brother, such an intimacy. Certainly her brother's social friends now held themselves aloof. Of these friends she had heard so much, and yet not one had been inquired for the family.

The children's voices roused their aunt to the necessity of prompt action. There were some purchases to be made and much packing to be done, and when Mrs. Barclay was told of the money which she had to take, she was even if she had to be carried from her bed to the carriage.

Her golden ring was the wish; the change would be beneficial. Open air was a possibility in the seclusion of a country house. Appetite would follow. Her features brightened. Miss Barclay caught the enthusiasm of hope.

"What will get well again?"

"My dear girl, it will greatly aid to the chance of her recovery," was the ready reply.

Within two days the family had reached their country house, and on the following Friday Miss Barclay returned to the city ready to keep the Saturday appointment.

Occupations and motions had aided her. She seemed to go to the bank, feeling that she had been permitted to leave her room to express her thoughts. No message had reached her from Mr. Howe, and she was listening her confidence in his honesty of purpose against certain misgivings which were worrying Mrs. Barclay. That lady was suddenly oppressed with the supposition that Mr. Howe was a private detective, and that she and her children were assisting on a plan which would result in her ruin.

This dread, in addition to her own prostration, was counteracting any good effects of her journey and materially increasing Miss Barclay's perplexities. Recalling Mr. Howe's voice and how it did not seem possible that they were deceptive. If so, then she knew nothing whatever of physiognomy. She would never again trust a man's tongue and eyes.

However, he was sincere. She felt that he was actuated by kind motives, and leaving this faith to sustain her, she set the bank holding with a certain degree of courage. To have even one friend or even to believe in the possibility of such a treasure is a source of wonderful consolation.

It did not occur to Miss Barclay to stop at any point for information, and in her abstraction she did not notice that she passed unobserved to the president's office. She had lost sight of the fact that the day was Saturday and the hour afternoon.

Mr. Messenger was seated at his table, apparently very busy. He acknowledged her entrance with a nod and proceeded to write.

"How do you mean?"

"It would be difficult to explain the meaning of my remark. We often see our mistake too late to say anything but regret them. Now, if you will go to the States."

Miss Barclay left the room, and Mr. Howe looked around him as if taking a mental inventory of its contents. It was certainly an expensively furnished apartment, but people are given to overlooking a lot of costly trinkets and concentrating their attention on a few objects of value, even if other parts of the house are left bare of ordinary necessities. money can procure. Say that you will be mine, and at once you wishes shall be carried out."

"Do you mean that you will marry me? I was sure that you were married."

Mr. Messenger's face was inscrutable. A bright color tinged his thin cheeks. He gazed with some hesitation.
